“Embracing Indigenous Knowledge in a Changing Climate: A Health Perspective”

SPEAKERS

Dr. Nicole Redvers

ASSISTANT PROFESSOR,
DEPARTMENT OF INDIGENOUS HEALTH,
DEPARTMENT OF FAMILY & COMMUNITY MEDICINE,
SCHOOL OF MEDICINE AND HEALTH SCIENCES,
UNIVERSITY OF NORTH DAKOTA

Dr. Nicole Redvers, ND, MPH, is a member of the Deninu K'ue First Nation and has worked with various Indigenous patients and communities around the globe helping to bridge the gap between Indigenous traditional and modern medical systems. She is co-founder and chair of the Arctic Indigenous Wellness Foundation based in the Canadian North. Dr. Redvers is currently an assistant professor in both the Department of Family & Community Medicine and the Department of Indigenous Health at the University of North Dakota where she has helped co-develop the first Indigenous Health Ph.D. degree program in North America. She has been actively involved at the international level in promoting the inclusion of indigenous perspectives in planetary health and education for sustainable health care. Her scholarly work engages a breadth of scholarly projects attempting to bridge gaps between Indigenous and Western ways of knowing as it pertains to individual, community and planetary health.

Mr. Suraj Das is a Senior Research Fellow at the Indian Institute of Technology (IIT) Roorkee, India. He is currently pursuing his Ph.D. degree in Sociology and is working in the western Himalayan communities, from socio-ecology and socio-climatological perspectives. He explicitly explores and analyzes the dynamic of traditional dietary practices in times of climate change for sustainable food security and adaptation policies. Suraj Das will be talking about locating indigenous beliefs in climate change adaptation policies through traditional dietary habits.
